All have the same breath emerges out of a two-year interdisciplinary, collaborative project investigating the politics of the environment and how the changing climate is experienced and negotiated across the world. More than ever, it is imperative that we study how ecologies are made and unmade throughout the history of the planet as well as everyday moments of resilience. All have the same breath considers our relationship to the earth, and how that relationship is mediated by outside forces. The title signals the vital importance of acknowledging that all things—human, animal, vegetable, and mineral—are dependent on the same ecosystem and, indeed, breathe the same air. The artists in the exhibition give visual expression to and raise urgent questions about how the global environmental crisis is experienced, felt, and visualized.
